Tip of the Week from our Clinician

Kids want parental attention so use that power for good!

Kids can be empowered to help out their families in times of stress. Give your kids some ways to help out, like entertaining younger siblings while parents are working. Make sure to praise them for contributing to the family.”

Staff Psychologist

This is a difficult time for everyone and you don't need to do it alone. If you or your child is struggling, we encourage you to schedule an appointment or join a parent support group in our Center for Effective Child Therapy. Contact us here.

Parent Tip of the Week

Laura B, parent to a 10-and 12-year old, finds that Zoom playdates are great at helping reduce the social isolation her kids have been feeling. Some activities that are a big hit with her family include:

Reading Would You Rather or Which is Worse books for kids found on Amazon.

Playing trivia with teams and using questions found in books or online

Making up songs

Dance parties!
Playing tic-tac-toe using the Zoom whiteboard

Their family has also sorted and put all of their family pictures into photo albums. It reminds them of the places that they have been and all of the great family times they've had together. A win-win all around!

The best tips are the ones that work! We'd love to hear from you about what is working for your child and family. Please email Cassie Poirier your ideas so we can share them with other parents and caregivers.
